

FACULTY WORKSHOP: WORKING WITH NEURODIVERSE STUDENTS

In our ever-evolving educational landscape, it is imperative for graduate school faculty and staff to cultivate inclusive environments and include those who are neurodivergent. Effectively working with neurodivergent students not only enhances their graduate school experience but also fosters a more equitable and enriching environment for all. This talk will be geared to graduate school faculty and staff and discuss insights and strategies for working with neurodiverse students to support their success, inclusion and empowerment.

SPEAKERS

Dr. Jane Thierfeld Brown is one of the leading authorities in the country on this subject. She is Director of College Autism Spectrum, a former Assistant Clinical Professor at Yale Child Study, Yale Medical School, and former Director of Student Services at the University of Connecticut School of Law. She has worked in Disability Services for 43 years.

Amy Rutherford, LPC-MHSP, currently serves as the director of the Mosaic Program at the University of Tennessee at Chattanooga. Founded in 2008 the program currently serves approximately 60 autistic students annually. Amy co-authored The BASICS College Curriculum, a four-book series based on curriculum for autistic college students as they transition in to and out of college.
